Before hooking up to the machine she had studied, as she too often did, the photograph of her and her mother in Rome, taken when she was twenty-one and Kitty was thirty-six. Just setting aside the picture and turning on the machine, Blanka let her eyes rest on Houston's belongings, which were beside the bed. In a way, knowing that Houston was staying with her now, even if only for a short while, helped Blanka as she re-entered the terrifying world of her dreams. What made her dreams so disturbing was their vividness, the relentless intensity, combined with her inability to act as she wanted to in them. She became the helpless witness to horrible deeds and she could do nothing to stop them. Being unable to act went against everything in Blanka's nature. And in recent months it seemed as if the helplessness of her dreams...
